COMMUNITY services are struggling to cope with a staggering rise in the cries for help from women caught in domestic violence. Victoria Shiel, director of the Gold Coast Community Legal Service, said in the past three years, the demand in the areas of domestic and family violence had jumped from 9 per cent to 28 per cent of their work.

The statistics were obtained in a census by the National Association of Community Legal Centres and she said they were part of an overall sharp increase in the number of people seeking free legal assistance on the Coast.

"Unfortunately, not all of them can receive the help they need and often have to return to violent homes," she said. The other alternative was homelessness or family law issues.

"We hate having to turn people away and we worry about the welfare of our clients," Ms Shiel said. "We are noticing the urgency of cases and we are getting more requests from people with critical needs for assistance."

Ms Shiel said domestic and family violence cases were not simple legal matters and often involved a need for housing, counselling of children, breaking tenancy agreements and making arrangements for children.

"These are more time-sensitive than other legal matters and help is often required more urgently," she said.

Ms Shiel said she was deeply concerned that when anticipated funding cuts of 30 per cent came in to effect in June next, her service would have even less resources to help victims.

"We would have to consider reducing our opening hours and staff working hours," she said. "This would mean we may not be in a position to maintain the 11 locations we use across the Coast to deliver frontline services such as information, advice and casework. We would also have to turn more away."

Kate Armstrong, of My Friends' Place, which provides emergency accommodation for women and children affected by domestic violence, said the statistics did not surprise her at all.

"We have four refuges on the Coast and we receive calls daily from women seeking help," she said. "We are full pretty much all the time and the hard part is turning away women and children on a regular basis, not knowing where they are going to. It's horrible getting calls from women and messages on Facebook when we are full."

Ms Armstrong said the need was so great the charity was planning to open another two to four refuges in the next 12 months but even then would not have enough refuges to meet demand.
